Various definitions have been and will be given of the qualifications that constitute genius; but with special reference to the matter in hand I would say, a genius is one whose thought cannot be anticipated. In war, when the average commander is confronted by such an one, he is all at sea: the usual plans to Checkmate an ordinary antagonist are Of no avail he cannot imagine how or where he will be struck and in this condition - he is already whipped. One of the essentials of genius, then, is the capacity to originate plans that are too deep, too boldly conceived for the ordinary or even the able man to anticipate or prepare for. And, as a beautiful voice is always accompanied by the capacity to learn music easily, so the ability to originate is accompanied by the courage to execute, the courage of your convictions, For the ability to make superior combinations goes for nothing if the person is too timid to test them.
