Not illustrated. 1904 Excerpt: .had in view--says her husband--the dreadful sleeplessness to which she had been in bondage for a quarter of a century, whose grasp had become more and more relentless, and the effects of which upon her nervous system were such as words can hardly describe. On Monday, the symptoms abated somewhat; but at night she was worse. Her disease caused her an agony not to be told; but she bore all with patience--with a patience which excited the wonder of her medical attendant. In the early morning, all the family were gathered round her bedside. Her breathing became slower and less convulsive, and at length gentle like that of one asleep; the distressed look changed into a look of sweet repose; the eyes shut, the lips closed, and the whole scene recalled her own lines: -- Oh, where are words to tell the joy unpriced, Of the rich heart, that breasting waves no more, Drifts thus to shore Laden with peace, and tending unto Christ! About half-past seven it became evident that the mortal struggle was on the point of ending. For several minutes we could hardly tell whether she lived or not; and at twenty minutes to eight she drew one long breath, and all was over. She died on August 11, 1878, at the age of sixty. The memoir of Mrs. Prentiss to which we have been indebted for this brief sketch is a goodly volume of nearly 600 pages, written by her husband, and...
