Forgotten Books, 2017. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand . Excerpt from Japan, Vol. 5: Described and Illustrated by the Japanese Artillery apart, the Japanese were more intelligently and effectively equipped for defensive and offensive purposes. Their armor, though heavy, did not form one piece. The brassarts and skirts were suspended loosely from the shoulders and waist, and even the hauberk was not solid, the general system being a flexible combination of metal plates and links. On horseback the bus/zis feet were partly protected by heavy metal stirrups shaped like a high-low boot with the sides pared away. The bows, from to 7 feet long, were of great strength, and nearly every warrior, whether mounted or on foot, carried one, - skill in archery being the samurai s proudest achievement next to dexterous swordsmanship. Of the Japanese sword it is scarcely necessary to speak. Already at the time of which we write it had become the splendidly keen, deadly weapon now famed throughout the world, and its superiority to the light, poorly tempered Chinese blade was as marked as the superiority of a modern rifle to a mediaeval arquebus. Something similar may be said of the glaive. It has been common to speak of Japanese spearmen, but, in truth, the spear as a thrusting weapon never found much favor in Japan. A long glaive with crescent-shaped blade, the convex edge sharpened to the keenness of a razor, was the bus/115 arm, and its manipulation for slashing rather than stabbing purposes had developed into a fine art. But the very excellence of his weapons and the value that they derived from the strength and expertness of their wielder spoiled the battle tactics of the samurai in mediaeval days. Individual skill ranked...
